

Nowadays it is possible for people to buy many products or pay for treatments that help them look younger.

- What are the consequences of this trend?

- Is this a good or a bad thing?

1. SAMPLE INTRODUCTION

One-liner points

- Trend: increasing availability/use of anti-ageing products and treatments
- Consequence: social + personal effects
- Opinion: predominantly negative

★ Sample

The growing availability of cosmetic products and treatments designed to maintain a youthful appearance has made attempts to delay the visible signs of ageing increasingly commonplace. While this development can enhance people's confidence and provide greater freedom of personal choice, I believe its wider consequences are predominantly negative because it can intensify appearance-related pressure and unrealistic expectations about ageing.

2. SAMPLE CONCLUSION

One-liner points

- Consequences: confidence + financial/social/psychological pressure
- Evaluation: benefits exist, but drawbacks are more significant
- Restatement: predominantly negative

★ Sample

In conclusion, the growing accessibility of anti-ageing products and treatments can help some individuals feel more confident about their appearance and exercise greater control over their personal choices. Nevertheless, the resulting pressure to maintain a youthful appearance, together with unrealistic expectations about ageing, makes this trend more detrimental than beneficial overall.

3. ● BODY 1 — CONSEQUENCES OF THE TREND

Students should discuss both positive and negative consequences, because the first question simply asks what the consequences are.

Consequence	Development	Real-life example
● Greater confidence	People who are unhappy with visible signs of ageing may feel more comfortable with their appearance after using cosmetic products or treatments.	Someone concerned about wrinkles may use skincare or a non-surgical treatment and subsequently feel more confident at work or in social situations.

 Greater personal choice	Technological and cosmetic advances allow individuals to decide how they want to manage their appearance rather than simply accepting age-related changes.	An individual can choose between skincare, cosmetic procedures or doing nothing according to their own preferences.
 Appearance-related pressure	As anti-ageing options become increasingly normalised, people may feel that looking older is undesirable and something that should be corrected.	A middle-aged person may feel pressured to undergo cosmetic treatment because colleagues or social-media personalities appear significantly younger.
 Unrealistic expectations about ageing	Constant exposure to youthful-looking celebrities and edited online images can make natural ageing appear abnormal or unattractive.	Someone may compare their appearance with heavily edited photographs and become dissatisfied with completely normal signs of ageing.

4. BODY 2 – IS IT A GOOD OR BAD THING?

Main argument 1 – Commercial pressure

Reason:

The beauty industry has a financial incentive to convince consumers that ordinary signs of ageing are problems requiring correction.

Development:

This can turn natural ageing into a source of insecurity and encourage repeated spending on products and procedures.

Example:

A consumer may continually purchase increasingly expensive creams or treatments because advertisements suggest that visible ageing reflects poor self-care.

Main argument 2 – Financial burden

Reason:

Some treatments are expensive and may require repeated procedures to maintain their effects.

Development:

People can end up spending substantial amounts of disposable income on appearance rather than more essential priorities.

Example:

Someone may repeatedly pay for cosmetic procedures while simultaneously cutting back on savings or other household expenditure.

Main argument 3 – Social attitudes towards ageing

Reason:

Normalising anti-ageing treatments may reinforce the idea that growing older is something embarrassing or undesirable.

Development:

This can reduce acceptance of natural ageing and place greater pressure on older people to appear younger.

Example:

Older employees may feel compelled to maintain a youthful appearance because of workplace expectations or age-conscious social environments.

Counterpoint – Personal autonomy

Reason:

Adults should generally have the freedom to decide how they manage their appearance.

Development:

If a person chooses a treatment voluntarily and understands its costs and limitations, there is an argument for respecting that decision.

Example:

Someone who uses a cosmetic treatment simply because it makes them feel more confident may experience a genuine personal benefit.

Evaluation

The key issue is not the availability of these products itself, but the pressure to use them in order to conform to an increasingly youthful ideal.

That is a strong hybrid-essay position because it avoids saying that all anti-ageing products are inherently bad.

5. FACULTY IDEA BANK – ALTERNATIVE ANGLES

These are different from the main student ideas, so you can use them when students need deeper discussion.

Faculty angle	Development
 Employment implications	If youthful appearance becomes associated with professionalism or attractiveness, older workers may experience subtle pressure to conceal their age.
 Intergenerational attitudes	A culture that excessively celebrates youth may unintentionally portray older generations as less attractive, relevant or socially desirable.
 Medicalisation of normal ageing	Ordinary biological changes may increasingly be treated as conditions requiring intervention rather than accepted as a normal part of life.
 Accessibility and inequality	Expensive treatments may create a visible divide between people who can afford to maintain a youthful appearance and those who cannot.
 Psychological dependence	Repeated cosmetic interventions may lead some consumers to become increasingly dissatisfied with their appearance and seek further procedures.
 Consumer freedom vs social pressure	The availability of choice can be positive, but the same market can create pressure by constantly presenting ageing as a defect that should be corrected.

6. WORKBOOK POWER EXPRESSIONS

Keeping to the high-end vocabulary level you prefer, but without overfeeding:

Expression	Meaning	Natural use
proliferation of	rapid increase/spread	The proliferation of anti-ageing products has changed attitudes towards ageing.

appearance-conscious	highly concerned about appearance	Modern societies are becoming increasingly appearance-conscious .
age-related changes	natural changes associated with ageing	People may become dissatisfied with normal age-related changes .
cultivate unrealistic expectations	develop unrealistic ideas	Social media can cultivate unrealistic expectations about youthful appearance.
commodify ageing	turn ageing into something commercially exploited	The beauty industry can commodify ageing by presenting natural changes as problems requiring products.
perpetuate an ideal	cause an ideal to continue	Advertising may perpetuate an ideal of perpetual youth .
succumb to pressure	give in to pressure	Some consumers may succumb to social pressure to maintain a youthful appearance.
normalise cosmetic intervention	make cosmetic procedures seem ordinary/expected	Widespread treatment can normalise cosmetic intervention at increasingly younger ages.
acceptance of natural ageing	willingness to accept ageing as normal	Society should encourage greater acceptance of natural ageing .
exercise personal autonomy	make one's own decisions	Adults should be free to exercise personal autonomy over their appearance.

★ BEST 8 FOR THE WORKBOOK

If you want the short version:

TREND

- proliferation of
- appearance-conscious

NEGATIVE CONSEQUENCES

- cultivate unrealistic expectations
- commodify ageing
- perpetuate an ideal of perpetual youth
- succumb to social pressure

BALANCED EVALUATION

- normalise cosmetic intervention
- exercise personal autonomy

🔥 Strong natural sentence

The proliferation of anti-ageing products may perpetuate an ideal of perpetual youth, causing increasingly appearance-conscious consumers to succumb to social pressure and view normal age-related changes as flaws.

And for the balanced side:

Nevertheless, the availability of such treatments can allow individuals to exercise personal autonomy and make informed choices about their appearance.
